

resourcesecurityinstitute.org www.laender-analysen.de www.res.ethz.ch
www.crrccenters.org

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT IN ADJARA: THE VIEW OF THE LOCAL POPULATION

Special Editor: Lili Di Puccio

- Development in Adjara: Insights from Batumi 2
By Nana Papiashvili, Tbilisi
 - FIGURES 4
Batumi Residents' Opinions on their Situation and Attitudes Towards Local Politics
 - Insecurity and Suspicion in the Wake of Urban Development Projects 8
in Batumi, Adjara
By Martin Demant Frederiksen, Aarhus
-
- CHRONICLE 10
From 27 March to 22 April 2012

Development in Adjara: Insights from Batumi

By Nana Papiashvili, Tbilisi

Abstract

This article gives an overview of public opinion in Batumi based on the 2012 nationally representative survey conducted by the Caucasus Research Resource Centers (CRRC). It examines people's attitudes toward local and national issues, discusses where people see improvement in their lives and the gaps that remain. The data shows that Batumi residents highly evaluate recent developments and believe that the right changes are being made. While people see a significant improvement in infrastructure, however, there are some key social issues that remain unresolved.

Overview

Those who can remember Adjara a decade ago would agree that the region has undergone a major transformation. It is probably fair to say that Batumi, the capital of the Adjara Autonomous Republic, has become one of the most attractive places on the Black Sea coast.

Like other regions in Georgia, Adjara's development has been on the government agenda for several years now. Publicity highlights the growing developments in Batumi, such as the opening of new hotels, cultural centers, and various events conducted attracting Georgians as well as tourists from abroad.

If we look at the official government statistics, we see extensive economic development in almost every area. There is dynamic growth in private direct investments in Adjara—in 2011 they equaled 149 million USD, out of which 44 million USD was domestic investment and 105 million USD foreign. This is impressive growth compared to 2004 when investment amounted to 50 million USD. Out of 149 million USD, the biggest portion goes to tourism (65 million USD) and construction (47 million USD). This investment is reflected in the level of tourism itself: according to official statistics, the number of tourists to Adjara has increased from 83,000 to 1,319,513 visitors in 2011, with one out of three visitors coming from outside Georgia. In fact, the number of hotels has almost tripled since 2009 (103 hotels in 2009, 278 hotels in 2011) (see Figure 1 and Table 1).

Despite its notable development there remain several challenges in the region. Like the rest of the country, unemployment is the number one issue. According to 2011 official statistics, the unemployment rate in Adjara is approximately 18%. If we take raw numbers, there were 25,200 people unemployed in 2000, which has increased to 32,500 in 2011. Unemployment reached a peak for the last decade at 25% in 2007 and 2008.

When evaluating these numbers, several questions come to mind. What does the local population think of the current situation in their region? Do they see the improvements and if yes, in what field? What are their needs and hopes?

This article will discuss public opinion based on the results of the survey "Public Attitudes in Georgia" conducted by the CRRC in February 2012. The study draws on 3,161 completed face-to-face interviews. The sample size is nationally representative including representative samples of Tbilisi, Kutaisi, Batumi, Poti, Rustavi, Telavi District, other urban and rural areas. The study was done for the National Democratic Institute of International Affairs (NDI) and sponsored by the Swedish International Development Cooperation Agency (Sida).

People's Attitude toward the Current Situation

According to the survey, the majority of the population in Georgia thinks that the country is going in the right direction. The Batumi population has the same attitude toward the direction of national politics as the rest of Georgia: overall more than 60% evaluate the direction positively—9% agree with the statement that Georgia is definitely going in the right direction, while 53% think the Georgia is mainly going in the right direction.

However, there is a difference between the Tbilisi and Batumi populations' assessment of their household situation since January 2008, when the last presidential elections in Georgia took place. In Batumi more people think that their households are better off (38%) than worse off (13%), while in the capital more people say they and their households are worse off (34%) than better off (22%). A big portion of the population in both cities thinks that the life is the same (Batumi 49%, Tbilisi 42%).

The current economic condition of households seems to be better in Batumi: 66% of the population in Batumi evaluate their economic condition as average, 13% as good, 12% as poor and only 2% as very poor. In the capital we get a less favorable distribution—57% describe themselves as average, only 3% as good, and 32% as poor. No one in either Tbilisi or Batumi assessed their current economic condition as "very good" (see Figure 2).

The positive attitude of people in Batumi is also reflected by how they view their future. When answering the question, “When do you expect your life to change for the better?”—again 19% of the Batumi population says things have already changed for the better, while only 7% in Tbilisi think the same. However, in both cities people are expecting positive changes soon: 38% in Batumi and 42% in Tbilisi think that their life will change for the better in 1 or 5 years. A big portion of the population does not know when to expect their life to change (Batumi 25%; Tbilisi 34%) (see Figure 3).

People’s attitude toward the current government is more positive than negative. This is true for the capital as well, though the Batumi population is more positive than Tbilisi’s: 67% (14% completely agree, 53% somewhat agree) in Batumi believe that the current government is making changes that matter to them, while 53% in Tbilisi state the same (9% completely agree, 44% somewhat agree). We see the same pattern when we talk about the local government: 61% in Batumi versus 44% in Tbilisi agree with the statement that their current local government is making the kind of changes that matter to them. Local governments in Batumi and in Kutaisi enjoy the most positive support across the cities surveyed in Georgia (see Figure 4).

The Most Important National and Local Issues

Jobs rank as the most important national issue in Batumi, as in the rest of Georgia. Indeed, only 39% of the city population consider themselves to be employed. After jobs, territorial integrity is the most important national issue in Batumi (29%). Issues connected with the economic situation, such as rising prices/inflation (26%), wages (25%) and poverty (23%) figure as the most important issues as well.

Regarding local issues, the cost of communal services is at the top of the list: 55% of the Batumi population named it as the most important local issue. Natural gas is the number two issue that remains problematic; although the gasification of the city has already started, 38% named it as an important issue. Transportation costs (27%), water supply (23%) and roads (22%) were also named as being important (see Figure 5).

Although drug addiction is the most important issue for 5%, it was named by 53% as one of the issues that has changed for the better since 2008. Indeed, over the course of one year, there was a 15% decline in the number of mentions of drug addiction as one of the most important issues; previously, in a March 2011 survey, drug addiction was much more prominent, with 20% of the Batumi population saying it was the most important issue. That was a higher number than in any other city, including the capital.

Drug addiction is one of the five issues that people consider to have undergone a positive change. As the most improved issue, the majority of the population (84%) named roads. Gas is mentioned by 63%, the sewage system by 61% and trash collection by 57%.

There were four issues named that remain the same: water supply (46%), quantity of kindergartens (54%), availability of local medical services (53%), and prices of kindergartens (32%).

Cost to households figured large among the issues that are seen as worse, especially emergency service costs (51%), cost of communal services (49%) and transportation costs (48%). Few consider that agricultural production (which in fact is falling) has improved (15%). In fact, the popular perception is that this issue has also either worsened (27%) or stayed the same (35%). (see Figure 6)

Although many challenges remain, Batumi is the only city in Georgia where people think that the gas situation and sewage system have significantly improved. According to the data, roads, trash collection and drug addiction issues are perceived to have improved nationwide. Thus, Batumi has seen positive change in more local issues than other Georgian cities.

Reforms that Matter

CRRC tried to find out what the most important political reforms are according to people in Batumi and which reforms are expected to be achieved in the next six months. Despite the fact that there are plenty of new hospitals being opened in various locations in Georgia, including Adjara, people still consider that the most important reform needed is in the healthcare system (mentioned by 41%). However, only 19% think that healthcare reform will be achieved. Surprisingly or not, electoral reform is the number two most important political reform named with 37%, and a quarter of the population believe that this reform is expected to be achieved. Tax reform (34%) is the third with agricultural (25%) and education reforms (24%) following on the list (see Figure 7).

Surprisingly, the least importance is given to media, property rights and business environment reform and few believe that these reforms are expected to be achieved in the next six months.

Conclusion

To summarize, many citizens of Batumi see what has happened as a success story. They believe that the national and local governments make decisions that matter to them, and agree that Georgia is going in the right direction. As the data show, Batumi has seen more positive change compared to other cities in the country. The larger investments into infrastructure seem to have led to improvements that are acknowledged by the citizens. The main positive changes are in infrastructure; however, unemployment, healthcare reform and other social issues remain unresolved.

The results of the survey “Public Attitudes in Georgia” can be found at the following website: <http://www.ndi.org/node/18677>

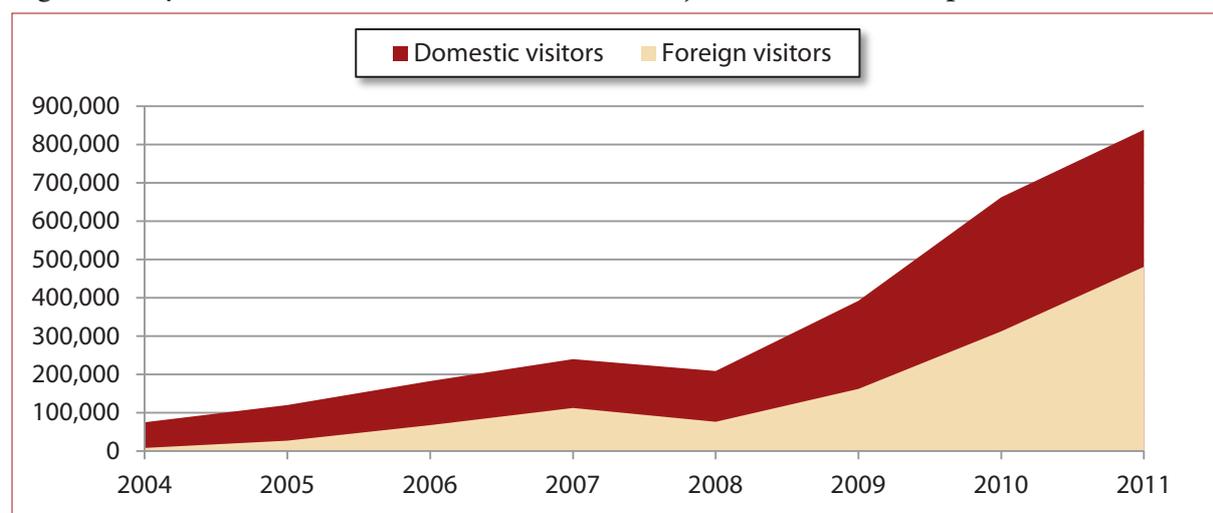

About the Author:

Nana Papiashvili is a Research and Outreach Associate at the Caucasus Research Resource Centers (CRRC) regional office.

FIGURES

Batumi Residents’ Opinions on their Situation and Attitudes Towards Local Politics

Figure 1: Dynamics in the Number of Visitors to Adjara Autonomous Republic (2004–2011)

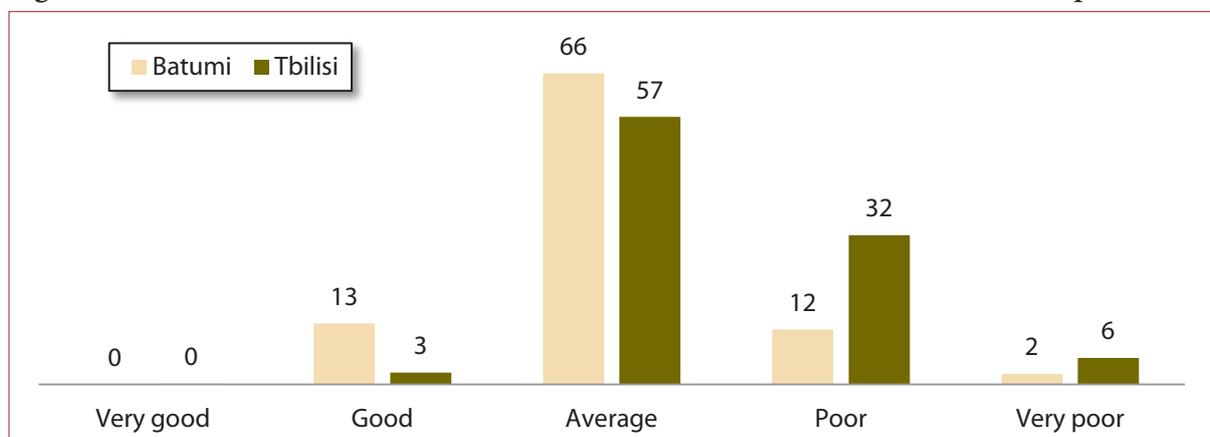

Source: Department of Tourism and Resorts of the Adjara Autonomous Republic

Table 1: Dynamics in the Number of Visitors to Adjara Autonomous Republic (2004-2011)

| | 2004 | 2005 | 2006 | 2007 | 2008 | 2009 | 2010 | 2011 |
|--------------------------|--------|---------|---------|---------|---------|---------|---------|-----------|
| Total number of visitors | 83,000 | 147,000 | 250,000 | 352,085 | 285,000 | 554,150 | 974,563 | 1,319,513 |
| Domestic visitors | 75,000 | 120,000 | 182,523 | 239,786 | 208,782 | 392,091 | 662,288 | 838,661 |
| Foreign visitors | 8,000 | 27,000 | 67,477 | 112,299 | 76,218 | 162,059 | 312,275 | 480,852 |

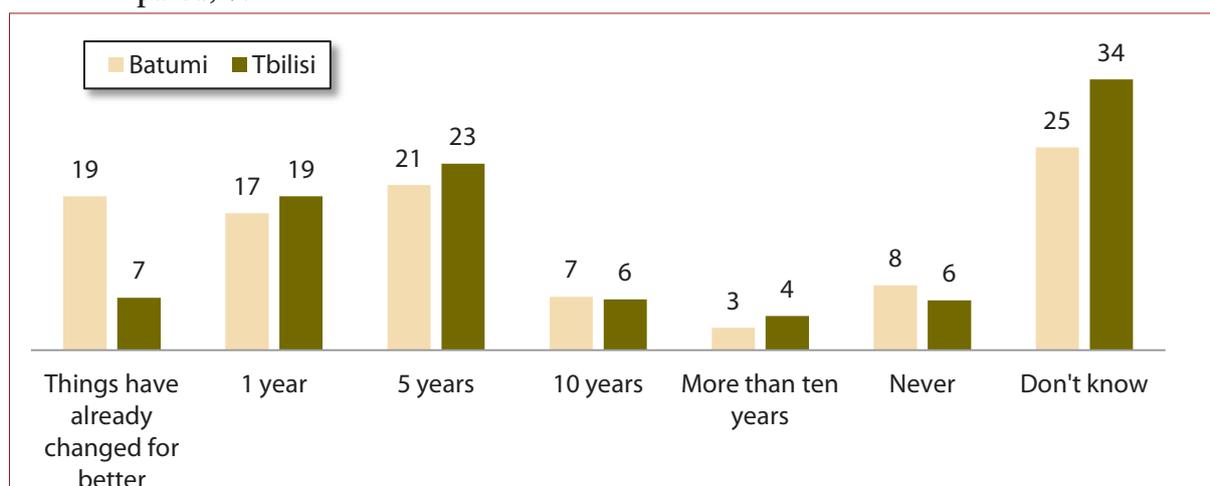

Source: Department of Tourism and Resorts of the Adjara Autonomous Republic

Figure 2: Current Economic Condition of the Household, Batumi and Tbilisi Compared, %

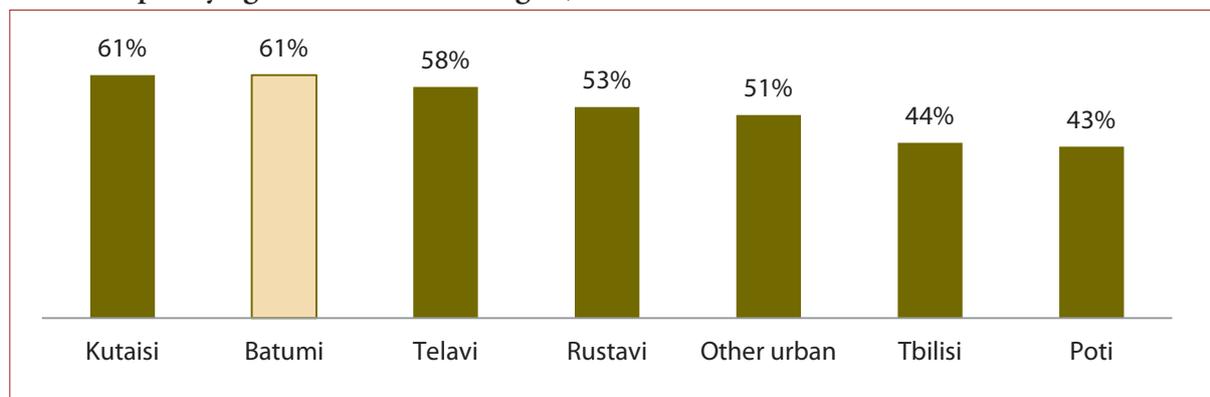

Source: Representative opinion poll by CRRC for Public Attitudes in Georgia, NDI 2012, <http://www.ndi.org/node/18677>

Figure 3: When Do You Expect Your Life to Change for the Better? Batumi and Tbilisi Compared, %

Source: Representative opinion poll by CRRC for Public Attitudes in Georgia, NDI 2012, <http://www.ndi.org/node/18677>

Figure 4: Your Current Local Government Is Making Changes That Matter To You (%) (Completely agree and Somewhat agree)

Source: Representative opinion poll by CRRC for Public Attitudes in Georgia, NDI 2012, <http://www.ndi.org/node/18677>

Figure 5: Batumi: Important Local Issues, %

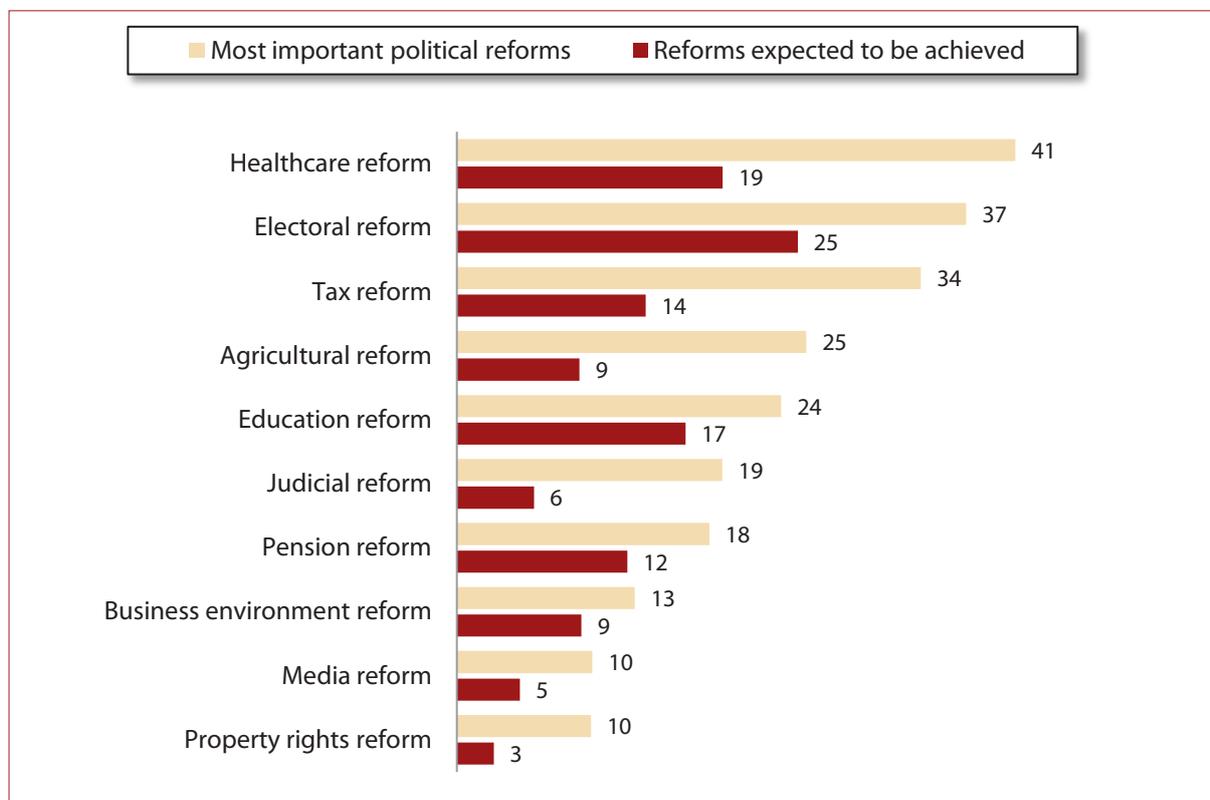

Source: Representative opinion poll by CRRC for Public Attitudes in Georgia, NDI 2012, <http://www.ndi.org/node/18677>

Figure 6: Batum: Local Issues that Have Changed, %

Source: Representative opinion poll by CRRC for Public Attitudes in Georgia, NDI 2012, <http://www.ndi.org/node/18677>

Figure 7: Batumi: Reforms, %

Source: Representative opinion poll by CRRC for Public Attitudes in Georgia, NDI 2012, <http://www.ndi.org/node/18677>

Insecurity and Suspicion in the Wake of Urban Development Projects in Batumi, Adjara

By Martin Demant Frederiksen, Aarhus

Abstract

Based on long-term ethnographic fieldwork in Batumi, Adjara, this article discusses how insecurity and suspicion has emerged in local perceptions of governmental development projects. Unemployed youth, in particular, show scepticism towards these developments, and although believing it good that things are being done, many feel uncertain as to where such developments are leading, what groups organize the projects, and who benefits from them.

Political Changes

With a subtropical climate and a location on the shores of the Black Sea, Adjara was well known in the Soviet Union as a holiday paradise for prominent leaders and a key area for growing crops such as tea, tobacco and citrus. As the Soviet Union fell apart in 1991, both the blossoming tourist industry and various agricultural endeavors came to an almost complete halt. Adjara had gained status as an autonomous region within the Georgian Soviet Socialist Republic. Unlike two other such regions, South Ossetia and Abkhazia, Adjara retained this status as Georgia gained independence. Aslan Abashidze's leadership was the main reason behind this success because he managed to steer the region clear of the armed conflicts emerging in others parts of Georgia, although his political relationship to the government in Tbilisi grew strained. Taking control over the police, army and customs offices, Abashidze held a firm grip on Adjara and its population, ruling the region in a despotic manner throughout the 1990s with little regard for Georgia's leaders. In May 2004, a few months after Georgia's Rose Revolution, Adjara again came under the direct control of the central government in Tbilisi, now led by the newly elected Mikheil Saakashvili. Ousting Abashidze from Adjara was seen as one of Saakashvili's first major successes.

Once Abashidze fled the region, things started to change rapidly. Among the most prominent changes was a concerted effort to boost tourism in Adjara. These efforts focused mainly on Batumi and sought to secure financial growth while also, through a series of demolition projects, signal that Abashidze's regime had come to an end. Myriad construction projects began, many of them based on a wish to symbolically erase the former influence of Abashidze by demolishing material signs of his previous presence.

Official rhetoric surrounding the projects declared that the future of the region (and the nation at large) was at stake. If the tourism sector could reach—and even exceed—its former prominence, it would ensure the kind of financial growth that would potentially benefit the local population. In the many public speeches delivered by President Saakashvili during his frequent visits to Batumi, he made it clear that developing tourism was a high priority, stating that Batumi was to become “the number one tourist destination on the Black Sea” and that the number of tourists visiting Batumi would reach that of Barcelona and Dubai in the years to come. While the president was full of good intentions, locals perceived his goals far differently.

My research, based on long-term ethnographic fieldwork among unemployed youth in Batumi in 2008–2009¹, revealed many young people to be sceptical towards the developments taking place in their city. It was not that they bemoaned the fact that Abashidze no longer controlled the region—many things had indeed been problematic during his time in power. The frequent (and at times complete) lack of electricity rendered streets dangerous at night, and poverty, crime and violence had been inherent features of their everyday lives. But although these aspects of life had been inconvenient, they also provided a perverse degree of certainty in the sense of their permanency. For instance, for many young people, particularly those roughly between the ages of 18 and 25, the time of Abashidze was perceived as a period of neither “post” nor “transition”. That is, it was not seen as something which had followed Soviet times and it was not seen as something necessarily leading to anything different. The tumultuous period from the early 1990s to the revolution in 2003 had simply formed the background to their childhoods and youth. As one young man made clear in an interview, he had not experienced his childhood as being in any way extraordinary because he had had nothing to compare it with.

1 The fieldwork was conducted during nine months and was based on a series of methods, mainly including participant observation among, and semi-structured interviews with, a group of 25 young men in Batumi. Data also included local policy papers and articles in various local newspapers.

For him, crime or street violence was something he had grown up with, and something he knew how to handle.

Suspicion and Conspiracy

With the ousting of Abashidze, life in Batumi had become more secure. But the developments aimed at securing the future of the region initiated by the government of Saakashvili were often read with scepticism. Why would this be so? Several issues were at stake.

First, many were unsure whether the future promoted by the government was one in which they themselves figured. Why, as many locals complained in interviews, did the government not build factories instead of hotels? This would ensure a more constant and secure source of income as the tourist-season not only is short but also uncertain in terms of the expected number of tourists actually coming. With the war in August 2008 such doubts increased dramatically. Conducting my fieldwork in Batumi at the time, I witnessed how the tourist season came to an abrupt end, and fears that the war would ruin not only that season, but many seasons to come were widespread. As one man noted; “The good thing about the war is that now people in Europe know where Georgia is—the bad is that now no one will ever dare to come here.” By the summer of 2009, tourists did indeed return to Batumi. According to local statistics around 137,000 foreign visitors came to the city, but although significant, this was not a number matching the desires of planners and politicians. The great quantity of hotels built in no way corresponded to the number of clients. The disparity meant that the vast majority frequently stood empty and many local businessmen lost considerable amounts of money. Who, locals complained in interviews, would ever stay in these hotels? Who were they being built for? Why so many?

Secondly, and in some ways related to the above, determining who was behind the projects was often unclear. One popular opinion was that it was Saakashvili himself, or at least his family or friends, who were trying to earn money on state-sponsored projects. Another theory was that the actual reason for the many hotels being built was related to a ring of businessmen (Russian, Turkish or Kazak) seeking to launder money illicitly earned through relations to organized crime. Some held that it was in fact Abashidze who, through Russian mediators, was slowly regaining power in the region. This, some argued, was perhaps even taking place with the knowledge of Saakashvili who, the argument went, officially promoted connections being built with the West while secretly allowing Russia to take over. Ironically, as governmental attempts to promote transparency and eradicate corruption intensified, local perception seemed to be not that corruption had been reduced, but rather that it had become better hidden.

Thirdly, concerned groups of citizens arranged public gatherings in the city, expressing their criticism of the architectural styles of the new buildings. A much discussed case was that of the Sheraton hotel—the first high-rise in central Batumi. While some were angered by the very size of the building, arguing that it went against the general appearance and historical-architectural legacy of a city consisting of much lower buildings, others were nervous that the design of the building bore traces of Turkish architecture. The top of the building was considered to resemble a Muslim minaret which was read as a sign of Turkish businessmen and architects secretly attempting to reinstate Turkish influence in the region. Such agitations were further fuelled by the fact that many of the construction-workers were held to be Turkish and not Georgian, meaning that jobs related to the many construction projects were not created for the local population but for foreigners.

It is noteworthy that there are religious undertones in the suspicions and conspiracies at stake, especially in relation to Turkish business interests, and these are often connected to a perceived threat of Muslim influence. Although a city where the majority of the population (around 63%) is Georgian Orthodox, the Turkish influence in the region’s historical past is vividly remembered. It is however also noteworthy that suspicions and conspiracies were rarely (if ever) framed as a question of Adjara vs. Georgia. Local aggravations toward the government, then, should not read as separatist sentiments. Developments in Batumi were rather seen as being an extreme case of processes taking place in many other major cities in Georgia. Indeed, the tensions existing locally in Batumi also exist among large parts of the population in Georgia proper in relation to reform and modernisation processes that have taken place since the revolution.

Conclusions

Whether the suspicions or conspiracies outlined above are related to actual reality is hard to determine—they might be truthful and they might not. At one level this is irrelevant. What is interesting is the ways in which they have come to animate local perceptions of contemporary developments in Adjara. There were, of course, also numerous locals who shook their heads at such opinions, saying that it was nonsense or mere hearsay. But suspicions, conspiracy theories, gossip, scepticism, uncertainties, and at times outright fear, thrived in Batumi in the shadows of governmental constructions. This prompts me to advise attention to the local ambiguities surrounding governmental efforts to secure Adjara’s future development. As reflected in Nana Papiashvili's article on developments in Batumi (also in this issue), statistics show locals to be positively minded toward developments concerning infrastructure (roads, gas supply, sewage, trash collection), but more sceptical when it comes to questions of what has been done in relation to social issues, unemployment and healthcare. This is a direct result of the fact that recent developments in Adjara, and particularly Batumi, have been aimed at the tourist industry rather than towards the more immediate needs of the local population. In this sense the development of Adjara and Batumi has been remarkably narrow, primarily addressing only one sector: tourism. To be sure, if tourism reaches the heights aimed at by the government (with several million visitors coming to the region each year) many locals will, potentially, benefit from the developments taking place in terms of increased job opportunities. But if this does not happen, then what? Indeed, the number of tourists visiting Adjara has increased substantially within recent years. However, the tourist season in Adjara is still restricted to a couple of months during summer. In terms of possible employment the remaining months of the year continue to be marked by a serious lack of opportunities for large parts of the local population, and future development policies should take this into account. If Batumi is to become the success-story hoped for, current developments need to be paired with an equal amount of attention being paid to other sectors where jobs could be created, and, more importantly, to the social needs of the local population.

About the Author

Martin Demant Frederiksen holds a PhD in Social Anthropology and is currently External Lecturer at the Institute of Culture and Society, University of Aarhus, Denmark.

Suggested Further Reading

- Peled, Daniella 2011. "Batumi Boom—Georgia". Monocle Vol. 48(5).
- Frederiksen, Martin Demant 2011. "Good hearts or big bellies—Dzimakatcoba and images of masculinity in the Republic of Georgia". In: Vered Amit & Noel Dyck (Eds.) Young men in uncertain times. Berghahn Books.
- Frederiksen, Martin Demant 2011. Haunted by time—Brotherhoods and temporal margins in the Republic of Georgia. PhD Thesis. Aarhus University.

CHRONICLE

From 27 March to 22 April 2012

| | |
|---------------|---|
| 27 March 2012 | The Chief of the General Staff of the Armenian Armed Forces Colonel-General Yuri Khachaturov visits Georgia |
| 29 March 2012 | The nineteenth round of the international Geneva talks between Georgia and Russia is held focusing on the non-use of force and international security arrangements |
| 29 March 2012 | The World Bank's private-sector investment arm, the International Finance Corporation (IFC), and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD) become shareholders in the Bank of Georgia by converting some of their loans to the bank into equity |
| 30 March 2012 | Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Grigory Karasin accuses Georgia of setting up an illegal armed formation next to the administrative border with the breakaway region of Abkhazia |
| 1 April 2012 | Bulgarian Prime Minister Boyko Borisov visits Georgia to discuss energy and transport projects between the two countries |
| 3 April 2012 | Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili meets with NATO Secretary General Anders Fogh Rasmussen at the NATO headquarters in Brussels |
| 3 April 2012 | The new parliament in the breakaway region of Abkhazia elects Valery Bganba as its new speaker |
| 4 April 2012 | Georgia's Civil Registry Agency declares that billionaire opposition politician Bidzina Ivanishvili is not eligible to obtain Georgian citizenship through a naturalization process |

| | |
|---------------|---|
| 6 April 2012 | Georgia says it has ceased its obligations under the Open Skies Treaty vis-à-vis Russia |
| 6 April 2012 | Georgia invites relevant international organizations to deploy long-term election observation missions to monitor the entire electoral campaign in the country in the lead up to the October parliamentary elections |
| 8 April 2012 | A mass opposition protest, including the Azerbaijan Popular Front Party (APFP), Musavat (Equality), and the People's Party as well as NGOs and youth groups, calls for reforms and the resignation of Azerbaijani President Ilham Aliyev in Baku |
| 9 April 2012 | The ex-chief of the local KGB Leonid Tibilov is declared the winner of the presidential runoff by the electoral commission in the breakaway republic of South Ossetia |
| 9 April 2012 | Georgian minister of culture and monument protection Nikoloz Rurua says that the Stalin museum in the Soviet dictator's hometown of Gori will be transformed into a Stalinism museum to focus on the Soviet regime's repressions |
| 10 April 2012 | Georgia tests a domestically-produced drone |
| 11 April 2012 | The opposition Industry Will Save Georgia party joins the opposition coalition Georgian Dream led by billionaire Bidzina Ivanishvili |
| 12 April 2012 | Six persons suspected of having participated in the assassination attempt on Abkhaz leader Alexander Ankvab are arrested in the breakaway region of Abkhazia |
| 12 April 2012 | A film festival of Azerbaijani films is cancelled in Armenia's second largest city of Gyumri after dozens of protesters block the festival venue |
| 12 April 2012 | The Russian Foreign Ministry recommends Russian citizens to refrain from travelling to Georgia due to the absence of security in the country for Russian citizens |
| 17 April 2012 | Georgian Prime Minister Nika Gilauri tells the first high-level meeting of the Open Government Partnership (OGP) in Brazil that the government is setting up an agency, the Georgia Reforms and Partnership Enterprise (GRAPE), to promote and export the country's reforms worldwide |
| 18 April 2012 | Georgian Foreign Minister Grigol Vashadze meets with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in the NATO headquarters in Brussels |
| 18 April 2012 | Azerbaijani investigative journalist Idrak Abbasov is beaten by security personnel from the SOCAR state energy company after filming a confrontation that erupted when SOCAR employees were demolishing houses in the village of Sulutepe near Baku |
| 19 April 2012 | NATO reiterates having "disagreements in principle" with Russia over Georgia during a meeting of foreign ministers in the framework of the NATO-Russia council in Brussels |
| 19 April 2012 | Azerbaijani security forces say they have killed the head of a group allegedly linked to al-Qaeda and have arrested 19 of his supporters who were planning to carry out terrorist attacks in Azerbaijan |
| 22 April 2012 | Several thousand protesters from the opposition movement demand the release of political prisoners and the resignation of Azerbaijani President Ilham Aliyev in Baku |
| 22 April 2012 | Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili and American property tycoon Donald Trump unveil a construction project for a residential tower to which Trump has lent his name in Georgia's Black Sea resort of Batumi |

Compiled by Lili Di Puppo

For the full chronicle since 2009 see www.iaender-analysen.de/cad

ABOUT THE CAUCASUS ANALYTICAL DIGEST

Editors: Lili Di Puppo, Hans Gutbrod, Iris Kempe, Matthias Neumann, Robert Orttung, Jeronim Perović, Heiko Pleines

The Caucasus Analytical Digest (CAD) is a monthly internet publication jointly produced by the Caucasus Research Resource Centers (<http://www.crrccenters.org/>), the Research Centre for East European Studies at the University of Bremen (www.forschungsstelle.uni-bremen.de), the Institute for European, Russian and Eurasian Studies of the George Washington University (www.gwu.edu/~ieresgwu), the Resource Security Institute in Washington, DC (resourcesecurityinstitute.org/) and the Center for Security Studies (CSS) at ETH Zurich (www.css.ethz.ch) with support from the German Association for East European Studies (DGO). The Caucasus Analytical Digest analyzes the political, economic, and social situation in the three South Caucasus states of Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia within the context of international and security dimensions of this region's development. CAD is supported by a grant from Robert Bosch Stiftung (<http://www.bosch-stiftung.de>).

To subscribe or unsubscribe to the Caucasus Analytical Digest, please visit our web page at www.res.ethz.ch/analysis/cad

Center for Security Studies (CSS) at ETH Zurich

The Center for Security Studies (CSS) at the Swiss Federal Institute of Technology (ETH Zurich) is a Swiss academic center of competence that specializes in research, teaching, and information services in the fields of international and Swiss security studies. The CSS also acts as a consultant to various political bodies and the general public.

Research Centre for East European Studies at the University of Bremen

Founded in 1982, the Research Centre for East European Studies (Forschungsstelle Osteuropa) at the University of Bremen is dedicated to the interdisciplinary analysis of socialist and post-socialist developments in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. The major focus is on the role of dissent, opposition and civil society in their historic, political, sociological and cultural dimensions. With a unique archive on dissident culture under socialism and with an extensive collection of publications on Central and Eastern Europe, the Research Centre regularly hosts visiting scholars from all over the world. One of the core missions of the institute is the dissemination of academic knowledge to the interested public. This includes regular e-mail newsletters covering current developments in Central and Eastern Europe.

The Institute for European, Russian and Eurasian Studies, The Elliott School of International Affairs, The George Washington University

The Institute for European, Russian and Eurasian Studies is home to a Master's program in European and Eurasian Studies, faculty members from political science, history, economics, sociology, anthropology, language and literature, and other fields, visiting scholars from around the world, research associates, graduate student fellows, and a rich assortment of brown bag lunches, seminars, public lectures, and conferences.

Resource Security Institute

The Resource Security Institute (RSI) is a non-profit organization devoted to improving understanding about global energy security, particularly as it relates to Eurasia. We do this through collaborating on the publication of electronic newsletters, articles, books and public presentations.

Caucasus Research Resource Centers

The Caucasus Research Resource Centers program (CRRC) is a network of research centers in Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia. We strengthen social science research and public policy analysis in the South Caucasus. A partnership between the Carnegie Corporation of New York, the Eurasia Partnership Foundation, and local universities, the CRRC network integrates research, training and scholarly collaboration in the region.

The Caucasus Analytical Digest is supported by:

Robert Bosch Stiftung

Any opinions expressed in the Caucasus Analytical Digest are exclusively those of the authors.

Reprint possible with permission by the editors.

Editors: Lili Di Puppo, Hans Gutbrod, Iris Kempe, Matthias Neumann, Robert Orttung, Jeronim Perović, Heiko Pleines

Layout: Cengiz Kibaroglu, Matthias Neumann, and Michael Clemens

ISSN 1867 9323 © 2012 by Forschungsstelle Osteuropa, Bremen and Center for Security Studies, Zürich

Research Centre for East European Studies • Publications Department • Klagenfurter Str. 3 • 28359 Bremen • Germany

Phone: +49 421-218-69600 • Telefax: +49 421-218-69607 • e-mail: fsopr@uni-bremen.de • Internet: www.laender-analysen.de/cad/